

ETHNIC AND SOCIAL DIVERSITY IN THE MEMBERSHIP
OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF POLAND: 1918 - 1938*

Gabriele Simoncini

The Communist movement in interbellum Poland was a small political entity that did not constitute a threat to the power of the state, nor did it become a visible presence since it failed to attract a majority of the working class. The movement, overall, consisted of a number of parties, organizations and groups, usually illegal, but some at times provisionally legal. The Communist Party of Poland - CPP (Komunistyczna Partia Polski - KPP) was the main party, entrusted with the guiding role by the Comintern, and also the umbrella organization and ideological reference point for the Communists throughout the twenty-year existence of the Second Polish Republic.<sup>1</sup> The CPP was originally formed under the name "Communist Workers' Party of Poland" - CWPP, (Komunistyczna Partia Robotnicza Polski - KPRP). In 1920, it briefly took on the designation "Section of the Communist International" of which it was a founding member. By virtue of its name, the Party proclaimed a total proletarian orientation, ignoring the reality of an almost completely agricultural Poland at the time.<sup>2</sup>

In 1925, at its Third Congress, the Party took on the name "Communist Party of Poland" - CPP, a consequence of its greater sensitivity to the problems of peasants and workers, keeping this name until the party's break-up in 1938.<sup>3</sup> Its demise was decreed by the Comintern on a personal order from Stalin, and all future use of the term "Communist" was thereby prohibited. After 1938, no party in Poland defined itself with the qualification "Communist." The commonly used term "Polish Communist Party" is actually incorrect, whether one is referring to the Communists of Poland after 1938, or to those of the years 1918-1938. During the twenty-year interbellum period, the CPP refused any national appellation and was, like all the other communist parties of the time, a section of the Comintern, which had, in turn, decreed the internationalist character of all communist parties and the universal identity of the communist movement, a movement hostile to the notion of borders because it favored the principle of class divisions. In Poland, proletarian internationalism turned out to be an absurd and incomprehensible slogan for a nation that, having only just regained its independence after more than a century of foreign domination, continued to teeter on the edge of extinction, threatened by the German and Russian powers.

The CPP, during the twenty years of its illegal existence, was a communist party based on principles established by the Comintern and on the communist ideology articulated by Leninist Bolshevism. The Party, at least in theory, was strictly revolutionary and proletarian, an avant-garde organization of professional revolutionaries, in accordance with Leninist canons that maintained social revolution as its prime strategic goal. In practice, however, the Party did not succeed in working along strict ideological lines. For example, the very principle of democratic centralism, at the base of Leninist Bolshevism, never functioned properly in the quotidian affairs of the Polish party, whose inner workings were complicated by a heavy Luxemburgian tradition and were marked by continual friction between opposing factions of differing ideological stamps. Moreover, the principle of iron-clad discipline preached by Lenin never gained precedence over the basic tendencies within the party towards autonomy and democracy.

In many ways the CPP was a unique revolutionary organization: its founding unified two other revolutionary parties, The Social Democracy of the Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania - SDKPL (Socjaldemokracja Królestwa Polskiego i Litwy - SDKPiL) and the Polish Socialist Party-Left - PSP-Left (Polska Partia Socjalistyczna-Lewica - PPS-Lewica). All other communist parties were formed as a consequence of schisms within a socialist party. The CPP sought to promote a strict proletarian revolutionary strategy in a nation that was largely agricultural and Catholic.<sup>4</sup> The Party had to confront the peculiar requirements of a working class which was small and highly fragmented, concentrated in pockets of "proletarian" workers. Moreover, this class was strongly nationalistic, tending towards reformism, and imbued with anti-Semitism. Finally, it was quite unattracted to Soviet revolutionary perspectives since Russia, and then even more so, Soviet Russia, remained a historic enemy and a constant threat to the existence and identity of Poland as a nation.<sup>5</sup>

The communist movement reflected within itself the complicated and chaotic social, ethnic and political patchwork comprising interbellum Poland. The CPP had the function of an umbrella organization for various parties, groups, and political organizations encompassing different social strata: workers, intelligentsia, peasants, and various ethnic groups - Poles, Jews, Ukrainians, Byelorussians; and groups that leaned toward revolutionary, populist, or communist theories and strategies.<sup>6</sup> The CPP was also the political umbrella for various social, intellectual, electoral, and trade-union groups that tended to come into and go out of existence, either legally or illegally. The CPP itself sometimes brought forth legal adjunct organizations, and supported and nurtured spontaneous groups of radicals and revolutionaries at large. At times contrasts flared up, but in general the dominating role of the CPP was guaranteed by the dictum of the Comintern: in each country there was to be a sole revolutionary center - a sole communist party.

In the Polish communist movement, the central position was occupied by the CPP, containing within itself workers, intellectuals and, in a very small way, peasants. The movement had two ethnic components: the Poles and the Jews. Other elements were negligible, being limited in number and confined to specific areas, like the Germans in Silesia, where membership in two revolutionary parties (the Polish and the German) was no rarity. The CPP was thereby sectioned into three distinct social groups and at least two ethnic ones.

Also under the umbrella of the CPP were two other major communist political components: The Communist Party of Western Ukraine - KPWU (Komunistyczna Partia Zachodniej Ukrainy - KPZU) and the Communist Party of Western Byelorussia (Komunistyczna Partia Zachodniej Białorusi - KPZB).<sup>7</sup> Their internal composition was similar, defined clearly by a strong peasant presence and with only one predominant ethnic element, Ukrainian or Byelorussian, respectively. There were, however, exceptions, due to the principle that within national territories, communists were to join the parties of the area in which they lived. Thus, there were individual cases or even small groups of Polish communists within the Ukrainian or Byelorussian parties and vice versa. This same variation occurred, though in a more limited way, with Jewish communists from these Slavic regions. The diverse ethnic components of the Communist Party surely did not ease the Party's internal workings, its revolutionary tactics and strategies, despite the communists proclaimed absolute internationalism and their refusal to abide by principles of territory or borders. As far as the Ukrainian and Byelorussian questions were concerned, the prime slogan for Polish communists always supported the principle sustained by Lenin, that of self-determination for all peoples including the right of secession and, in the Polish case, the right to follow the path to extension, to Sovietization. This slogan was not successful in recruiting the Ukrainians or Byelorussians and only alienated the Polish people since they perceived the communists to be more closely connected to interests of the Soviet Union rather than to their own national interest.

The Jewish minority was not an issue since the Polish Jews did not have territorial claims to exercise. There was, however, another problem. The Jews presented, in their own way, a threat to the State. Their ethno-cultural cohesion, their numbers, their non-integration, their economic competitiveness, and their religion set Jews apart, and they were perceived as a profoundly foreign entity in Polish society. Similarly, although for different reasons, the Communists were also perceived as a foreign entity, with the added complication that they were considered subversive promoters of the Soviet peril, and simply agents out of Moscow. From the political association of these two groups there arose in the Polish mass media of the time the term "żydokomuna," Jewish Communist Conspiracy, a fitting designation for the "unholy" alliance between communists and Jews, an entity of utter foreignness and a menace to the Polish nation.<sup>8</sup> The term had negative connotations arising both from historic anti-Semitism and the more recently developing anticommunist sentiments in every stratum of Polish society.

On the other hand, within the Communist party itself, strictly along ideological lines, there was no problem regarding the Jewish Communist or sympathizer, since a Jew (as a member) was, first and foremost, a Communist. A member's declaration that he was a Communist implied an automatic loss of Jewishness. This was the case for many leaders of the CPP, exemplified in the famous international revolutionaries Luxemburg and Trotsky. Coming from the Polish Jewish world, a revolutionary did not have much of a choice, for in general the Jewish community stood well apart from any sort of revolutionism and even secularism. The non-religious sector, whether of revolutionary, radical, or socialist tendencies, was dominated by the Bund, a historic Jewish socialist party that did not give the Jewish Communists any room to operate either inside itself or in the sparse secularist fringes of the Jewish communities.<sup>9</sup> Other cases of revolutionary organizations such as the Fareynikte or the Poale Zion-Left were really negligible and inconspicuous entities. The Jewish component was, nevertheless, an internal complication for the CPP, in part because within the complex Polish political arena, the Party was branded as the żydokomuna, and in part because anti-Semitism was still an open question in the history of the workers' movement, as attested by the ideological differences of the communist, socialist, reformist and revolutionary movements. The "Jewish question" was a long-debated issue within the revolutionary movement, always argued about amongst socialists and communists - see the notorious positions of Kautski, Marx, Lenin and, later, Stalin, on the subject. Finally, a certain degree of anti-Semitism in the Polish working class had been established and nurtured for some time, and this, for the Communists, represented another hindrance in their influence within the class itself.

Its numerical, ethnic, and social components are major intricacies and complications in the history of the Communist Party. It is not simple to arrive at a cohesive and logical portrayal of these elements since the documents detailing them are fragmentary and generally refer to only specific and isolated periods. The available sources tend to break down into four distinct types: a) statistical materials and their analyses, sometimes published by the Party presses together with the documents produced at congresses, conferences or by various organs of the party; b) documents of the Interwar period in the files of the State Police; c) a collection of questionnaires and interviews pertaining to Communist militants of the interbellum period, produced by the Archives of the Central Committee of the Polish Unified Workers Party from 1949 onward; and d) materials published from the 1970's onward, devoted to the history of the workers' movement, including biographical dictionaries, together with studies by Polish historians such as Kowalski and more recently, Szczygielski.<sup>10</sup>

While the number of Party members from 1918 to 1938 varied by thousands, it seems realistic to estimate the total number at a minimum of about 5,000 and a maximum of about 25,000 or more (including the youth organizations) according to the period.<sup>11</sup> It remains difficult to establish the exact number both because of incomplete data and a degree of confusion added by official historiographic studies of post-bellum Poland. Probably the original data coming from the CPP itself, even if only partial, may give the best idea of the real substance of the Party. Thus, the following description of the Party's beginnings and growth is based on these data as well as on the other

For the years 1918-22, 1926, and 1929, the available data are sparse. The general difficulty of establishing the exact numbers of party members is a consequence of the fact that certain data were not recorded by anyone, neither by the party itself nor by the State Police. The CPP was always an illegal organization and the number of its members was, among other things, subject to the variations brought about by repression; Communists in prison (from about 1,000 to 5,000, according to the period) were generally not counted among the Party members. Besides this datum of relative importance, the number of Party members was always in a state of "natural" fluctuation; it varied with great rapidity and facility. Moreover, for periods of time and in entire geographical regions, the Party itself simply did not know the numbers of its own members, cells and even local organizations, which came and went. Finally, members and sympathizers were not always easily distinguished. A high degree of "revolutionary spontaneity" was present in the Party, even in the area of organizational questions, during its entire existence. It may be useful to note that after the dissolution of the Party in 1938, various territorial organizations refused to disband and continued to operate on their own, at a local level, until the Nazi invasion and even thereafter. Determining the number of Communists on the run in this period is particularly difficult.

For various reasons, therefore, the above number (from 5,000 to 25,000) remains, together with its fluctuations, approximate as does the numeric distinction, which remains to a certain extent dubious, among the party's distinct ethnic components and varied organizations such as the youth. In consideration of this, the total number of members may be subdivided into three distinct parts: the CPP comprised from a minimum of 40 percent up to a maximum of 70 percent with an average tendency of 58 percent. The CPWU went from a minimum of almost 10 percent up to a maximum of almost 35 percent with an average of about 20 percent. The CPWB, in its turn amounted to a minimum of more than 5 percent up to a maximum of 45 percent with an average of 22 percent. In ethnic terms, the phenomenon of fluctuation appears significant and even more conspicuous for certain years.<sup>12</sup>

	Total Members	CPP	CPWU	CPWB
1923	7,590	72.5%	20.5%	7.0%
1930	6,600	50.0%	19.7%	30.3%
1933	17,800	51.7%	25.8%	22.5%

It should be added that the CPP operated over approximately half of the national territory containing about 60 percent of the population; the CPWU operated over an area (ethnically Ukrainian) amounting to another quarter of the national territory and population, and the CPWB operated over a territory (ethnically Byelorussian) amounting to about one quarter, with a population of less than a sixth the national total. Finally, the Communists were concentrated in small “red islands,” such as Warsaw and the Dąbrowa industrial basin, and not to be found throughout the national territory and absent from it in large part. Around the middle of 1935, the CPP comprised in the Warsaw area alone about a quarter of the total (about 8,000) of its members, while there were just 140 in Kraków and 75 in Poznań. In 1919, the CPP (at that time, the CWPP) had 2,400 members (about 40 percent of the national total) in the mining district of Dąbrowa, while at the end of 1921 it had 500 members and in 1935 only 280.<sup>13</sup>

The ethnic makeup of the Communist Party reflected the mosaic of ethnic groups comprising Polish society, and in terms of communist ideology it represented a plain example of “proletarian internationalism”. Among the Communists in Poland there were Poles, Ukrainians, Byelorussians and Jews, together with a scattering of Germans, Lithuanians and Russians.

Even with regard to the Party’s ethnic composition, the sources are incomplete. The ethnicity of Communist members does not seem to have been an object of particular interest; the documents of the state police did not record ethnic information, nor did the documents produced in postbellum Poland. The major source of such information is the statistical documents produced by the party itself on the occasion of national congresses, analyzed thereafter also in various publications.<sup>14</sup> Of the delegates to the Second National Congress (1923) of the CPP, 85 percent declared themselves Polish. At the sixth and final Congress (1932), that number had gone down to 55 percent with 26 percent Jewish, 9 percent Byelorussian and 5 percent Ukrainian.<sup>15</sup> The level of approximation is in any case high in these cases since in these documents there is confusion as to various designations such as Pole (polak), Silesian Pole (ślązak), Pole of Jewish descent (polak pochodzenia żydowskiego) and Jew (żyd). A realistic estimate of the ethnic makeup of the party may be that Poles made up two thirds of the total and Jews almost a third. Also to be taken into consideration are limited numbers of Ukrainians (2.3 percent) together with a few Germans in Upper Silesia and other scattered cases such as the city of Łódź (5 members in 1930).<sup>16</sup>

Here statistical data represent a political problem, most of all as regards the number, previously inflated, of Jewish members, to whom has been attributed the ripening of cosmopolitan ideas, internationalist strategies and anti-nationalism. As has already been said, the estimation of their number as a quarter of party members is approximate, and most likely in the party’s leadership - at least in certain of its organizations - the Jewish component was greater. This statistic together with other reasons cited above caused the party to be labelled “żydokomuna,” a label that in many ways and for a great number of Poles was certainly appropriate. It has to be remembered in any case that the internationalist and anti-nationalist strategies were within the dictates of all communist parties of the Comintern, without any implications for the Jews. The issue regarding a Jewish Communist in a position of leadership (in the Party and within the institutional power) remained alive, and assumed various forms later in Poland's Peoples' Republic, and still represents a motivation for debate.

As far as the ethnic makeup of the CPWU is concerned, matters are more simplified. The Party was composed of Ukrainians almost in its totality (more than 85 percent), clearly due to the Party's operating in ethnic Ukrainian territory. In specific cases the numbers varied. In the Lwów region, Ukrainian membership fell below 70 percent, with the rest consisting of Poles and Jews. In the city of Lwów itself, the Ukrainian membership comprised 40 percent, while Poles and Jews numbered 30 percent each.<sup>17</sup>

The CPWB operated in Byelorussian ethnic territories, and 80 percent of its membership came from them together with Ukrainians in the Polesie. The Jewish component amounted to over 10 percent, with Poles, mostly concentrated in the urban areas (Białystok, Grodno), comprising 3 percent, and Lithuanians one percent.<sup>18</sup>

The social makeup of the Communist Party was diversified, with elements from almost every social class found within its ranks. Workers, intellectual workers, and peasants formed the three major categories. In the case of the CPP, workers were present in numbers that oscillated from 65 to 80 percent, intellectual workers from 11 to 27 percent, and peasants from 3 to 5 percent.

The CPWU's structure was more centered and focused on the peasant contingent, with workers making up about 42 percent, intellectual workers 7 percent and peasants about 47 percent. Still further influenced by the peasants was the CPWB, whose worker membership averaged 30 percent, with intellectuals comprising less than 4 percent and peasants a majority of 65 percent.<sup>19</sup> Approximation and fluctuation must be taken into account also with regard to these data, together with a lack of precision in statistical documents on certain categorizations such as farmer (rolnik), peasant (chłop), agrarian worker (robotnik rolny) and others.

In the mid-1930's, the three parties together, the CPP, the CPWU and the CPWB, retained a "proletarian" majority, even if in a relative sense. The worker membership added up to about 48 percent of the total with intellectuals around 7 percent and peasants 41 percent. In any case, these data remain approximate. The phenomenon of fluctuation is the cause of variable and inconsistent statistics according to the period, which is also the case when data from the Party's various congresses are considered.

The worker component of the Party was concentrated primarily in the metal-working industry, mining, steel, and also in the textile, chemical, glass and tobacco manufacturing sectors. The number of unemployed Party members was constant and high and, because of its fluctuation, is difficult to estimate. The phenomenon of unemployment among Communists was a constant often associated with arrests and detention, and the majority of workers in the party remained unemployed for more or less lengthy periods. As for the Jewish communist workers, they were usually employed in small industries, in crafts, and as commercial workers. They were a significant presence in specific sectors such as garments, wood and sugar and their characteristic trades as printers, tailors, barbers, house-painters, porters, and waiters. A certain number of Jewish workers and artisans lived in abject poverty, sometimes nearer conditions resembling more those of the "Lumpenproletariat" than the "Proletariat."

The contingent of communist intellectual workers represented a very small part of the Polish intelligentsia. A conspicuous number of members were of Jewish origin, most of them teachers, journalists, and office workers. The data of the CPP congresses show a distinct prevalence of teachers and journalists up to the beginning of the 1930's, while the information of the Sixth Congress of 1932 shows a great drop in all categories of intellectual workers and a sharp increase in those defined as "professional revolutionaries" (zawodowi rewolucjonisci) to over 65 percent of the total of intellectual worker delegates. This category amounted to 5 percent of the Second Congress of 1923. The criteria for its definition are not clear, but in any case those who were counted within it were functionaries (funkcjonariusz) of the Party since they were professional revolutionaries.<sup>20</sup>

The peasant contingent in the CPP was very small, but quite conspicuous in the other two parties, the CPWU and the CPWB. It should be added that the revolutionary peasants also had other specifically agrarian organizations such as the Independent Agrarian Party (Niezależna Partia Chłopska), Byelorussian Agrarian Workers Hromada (Białoruska Włościanko-Robotnicza Hromada) and the Union of the Agrarian Left Samopomoc (Zjednoczenie Lewicy Chłopskiej "Samopomoc"), all legal organizations. Relations between these organizations and the CPP were not always untroubled and they sometimes were in conflict. In general the Communist Party did not succeed in taking control of all the revolutionary peasants.

Other data may give a more precise notion of Polish communists. It is known, for example, also from the documents released at the Party congresses, that the Communists began their political activity in almost all cases before the age of thirty, and in half of all cases, they were under twenty. The decided majority of intellectual workers joined the Party before they were twenty years of age, half of the workers before they reached twenty and the other half before their thirtieth year; the peasants in a majority of cases became members between their twentieth and thirtieth years. Almost all of the worker delegates to the Third Congress in 1925 declared themselves independent of their families before the age of twenty at the time they took out membership. The percentage of intellectual workers was low (17 percent) and there was a drop in that of the peasants (to 9 percent).

Regarding political origins, the delegates to the Congress mentioned their prior experiences in other parties: SDKPiL, PPS-Lewica, foreign revolutionary organizations, the Polish Socialist Party, other socialist parties, farm parties, and the Communist Youth Union. The estimated percentages at the Sixth Congress (1932) were SDKPiL - 25 percent, PPS-Lewica - 11 percent, foreign revolutionary organizations - 14 percent, the Polish Socialist Party - 8 percent, other socialist parties - 11 percent, agrarian parties - 5 percent, and the Communist Youth Union - 26 percent. In 1923, at the Second Congress, political origins stemmed in large part from the two organizations that had led to the founding of the Party itself: SDKPiL - 31 percent, and PPS-Lewica - 15 percent, with the socialists accounting for 28 percent.<sup>21</sup>

Finally, with regard to education, the members of the CPP were almost all literate, with about half of the workers holding skilled jobs. The large majority of members were self-taught, with some years of interrupted schooling or elementary school only. The percentage of those who had finished middle school was low, and it was minimal for secondary school. Among the delegates to the congresses, however, the level of education was quite a bit higher and varied substantially from one Congress to another. The self-taught were between 8 and 13 percent, those with an elementary school education between 16 and 44 percent, those who had finished middle school from 17 to 31 percent, and those with a secondary school education from 10 to 27 percent. Besides Polish, which served as the official language at the Congresses, all the delegates knew at least one foreign tongue, about a third knew at least two, and about a fifth at least three. Almost ten percent knew four or even five languages.<sup>22</sup> Many had been educated in different countries and under different foreign occupiers, and many others had been educated in two countries. Of decisive importance was ethnic background, which was itself the cause of bi- or trilingualism. Finally, the Communist leadership was not only of an international or internationalist political formation. It was characterized, furthermore, by an international militancy in many countries and parties at once, and some of its members had consequently spent their lives in many countries as a matter of course.

An international and internationalist leadership for a polyethnic, multinational, and internationalist Communist Party was only natural. But in a Poland that had only just regained its sovereignty and which maintained strong ties to deeply rooted traditions of heroic and romantic nationalism, with aspirations of expansion and polonization to the east, the Communist Party stood out as a foreign body. Its ideological inflexibility, its incapacity to adapt to reality and to the course of events kept it hampered by the constraints of illegality, making it a negligible entity without perspectives in the political arena, where its strategy resulted in self-destructiveness. It was also of little consequence on the path of revolution, where its strategy was likewise limited and self-confining. With the passing of time, the young Party became more and more the instrument of the volatile whims of the Comintern and Stalin until they decreed its political end and the physical destruction of its leadership and members that had taken refuge in the Soviet Union. The Communist Party of Poland was one of the first communist parties to be born and the first to die at the hands of the Communists themselves.
